

THE FIRST HUNGARIAN INFLATION: 1920-27

A Rational Period Structure

Mervyn Benford

Much has been written in philatelic literature about the notorious second period of economic inflation in Hungary between 1920 and 1927, which swept the price of a letter from the equivalent of pence to billions and billions of pounds, but it was not the first time that such economic troubles had affected Hungarian postal tariffs. Following the First World War, when the Treaty Settlements removed almost 70 per cent of Hungary's territory to enlarge Romania and create the new States of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, the Hungarian economy suffered considerable damage and this was reflected in postal charges. Little has been written about this subject; from time to time articles have appeared about the stamps, or the postage due markings, and even occasionally an attempt to make sense of the changes that occurred to postal rates. But nothing comprehensive or conclusive has emerged.

No Neat Divisions

The arrival of the superb book A Magyar Bélyegek kézikönyve, another in the long series of expert reference texts to be published within Hungarian philately, offers an opportunity to pull the various threads together and the purpose of this article is to do just that. The 'black book', as it is called by those of us who regularly consult it, is not all that easy to use, the Hungarian language being the first problem, but scattered within its pages are sections on postal rates which, if not serving the entire postage stamp period, give the information from which the events of 1920-27 can be described. The book also offers its own period structure but fails on one key concept, and it is the same fault that has made it difficult to use the attempts by others to establish a clear structure for the periods. The inflation of the Second World War divides very neatly into various periods, but this is not the case in the 1920-27 situation; some rates changed when others did not and new categories appear, such as airmail and official mail. Furthermore, there has been no clear idea of when the inflation officially began.

I have always accepted the argument of an Austrian researcher who set 1920 as the start of the inflation. The black book, rather than pitch at a date nearer the end of the war, also does this. Rates did increase from 1918 to 1920 but only at normal levels and the first quickening that one may discern comes on 1 January 1920, with a further change on 1 July. I believe that we may usefully set the start of periods 1 and 2 at those dates.

Official Mail

There then follows a relatively stable period of eighteen months but during this time, on 1 July 1921, official mail was introduced. This had its own tariffs, including more generous weight steps, and its own regulations. For example, all mail had to be posted at post offices, for logging purposes. If posted elsewhere it required a 100 per cent surcharge to compensate for avoiding the required procedure. All such mail had to be registered, though this appears to have been heavily disregarded.

In terms of periods, however, changes followed in tandem with other domestic classes of mail, but did not last the entire length of the inflation period, ending after just three years. Special official stamps were issued for use on such mail, though instances occurred of ordinary definitives also being used. The whole topic of official mail at this time is a study in itself and some of the material is extremely scarce.

For the purposes of the period structure, the arrival of this new category comes within period 2 and I have classified it as period 2a. In conjunction with all other mail classes, rates rose on 1 January 1922, which gives us the start of period 3. But on 22 June and 28 July airmail rates appear for the first time. The change of rate after just five weeks makes it a period in itself in terms of airmail alone but it does not affect any of the other classes of mail and so I have given it a sub-classification within period 3, namely 3a and 3b.

Just three days after the second airmail rates appeared the rest of the system changed on 1 August 1922, and this marks period 4, seven months after the last major change. Effectively the rates of period 4 doubled those of period 3. The subject of airmail is a topic in itself within the overall inflation theme. It had its own rules. The charges were a supplement to the basic letter rate charge by weight and, until 17 May 1928, airmail letters carried a compulsory Express charge as well. The airmail supplement was itself weight-related. By the end of the period quite large numbers of high value (Korona) stamps were appearing on airmail items.

A further change in airmail rates came on 15 September. No other changes were involved and so this becomes period 4a. On 5 October there was a major, but not uniform, move in postage rates. It affected only surface mail to foreign destinations, and charges for registered and express mail (these, of course, affecting domestic charges as well). It also affected airmail. Less than a month later the rest of the
